WEATHER BODIES

Opening 22 January 2025
Until March 2025

Weather Bodies expands upon Damiani's ongoing exploration of materiality and temporality, positioning weather as a condition of coexistence between bodies and environments. The exhibition represents a continuation of the artist's interest in geological and ecological processes, employing sculptural forms to propose a shared and evolving understanding of a world in flux and of the interdependence of all things. By collapsing the distinctions between the human and the geological, the temporal and the timeless, Damiani proposes a reconsideration of the dynamic processes that shape our world and ourselves.

The exhibition reflects on the multiple dimensions of the concepts of weather and weathering, examining their roles as transformative forces that surpass human perception while deeply shaping material and ecological processes. Weather is understood as both fleeting and expansive—a storm, a season, and an agent of geological and ecological change. To weather is to endure and transform, an ongoing interplay of forces that destabilizes fixed notions of matter and form.

This framework informs the works on view, in which Damiani draws attention to the interconnectivity between organic and inorganic realms. The sculptures, made from marble, copper, and bronze, resemble plant-like shapes, cellular forms, and traces of vitality embedded in mineral substrates. These compositions explore the porous boundaries between life and non-life, engaging with themes of decay, resilience, and mutual transformation. The materials, shaped over millennia by planetary processes, actively participate in this dialogue, embodying histories of change, adaptation, and reconfiguration.

The exhibition is the third part of a project that began in 2020 and whose first part titled Ensayos de lo Solido was presented at the MAC Museum of Contemporary Art Lima in June 2022, and a second part titled Mineral Ways at Galerie Nordenhake Stockholm in November 2022.

FLOW STRUCTURES

Opening 16 November 2016
Until January 2017

The multiplicity of networks and successive interrelated layers that compose the Earth - stratum upon stratum - suggest that penetrative fabrics construct the underground. Porous materials are everywhere around us, in nature and technology. Elena Damiani presents a series of sculptural works which subtly suggest the acidity of space-time against the soft infirmity of matter so as to articulate an image of the composition of the natural world.

The exhibition prompts questions about the materiality of the Earth in order to suggest the interconnectivity of geological elements and the underlying processes that construct our surroundings. The works make reference to geological events such as sedimentation and filtration, revealing the permeable character of unconsolidated materials and the porous mechanics of the Earth. They highlight the interaction between flow structures, travelling sediments and unconformities in morphology that compose a dynamic surface and underground of a body that is not bounded in a well-defined way. In doing so a series of sculptural works are displayed as overlapping layers acting as filters within the space. They are not composed of solid or compact materials, but of porous mediums, which remain unconsolidated allowing light fluxes and generative liminal spaces between them.

Upon entering, the work Blind (after Bertoia) - composed of a series of copper tubes arranged in one line on a marble base - stands as the first layer in the exhibition. The work takes as its starting point Harry Bertoia's sculpture Untitled (Monumental Sonambient) from the Standard Oil Commission, 1975. The metal structure has alternating marble cylinders placed at different heights as a screen which separates the entrance of the gallery from the main exhibition space. The small pieces of marble and vertical voids create a constant shifting light that oscillates on the copper surfaces.

The two geometric compositions resting on the floor are evocative of processes of filtration and erosion reflecting upon the firmness of inorganic materials. The travertine and concrete slabs exhibit surfaces full of small cavities characteristic of pervious materials. Unsaturated mudcrack is a rectangular work composed of three juxtaposing elements displaying a fissured surface. The collapsed concrete slab reveals an inner wire mesh in brass. In Casting voids two pieces casted in brass rest on a travertine base on the floor. The peculiar morphology of the travertine presents a network of interconnected channels of non-uniform sizes and shapes. The surface of the porous solid has been partially casted in brass as positive volumes mapping the empty spaces between the rock sediments.

The series Filters are collaged stone slices of different densities that ask for a closer reading of surfaces. They testify to the presence of crusts and exchange of materials within a layered underground. The juxtaposition of solid stone sections, small metal inserts and hollow space presents us with parts of wholes, configurations and contexts.

Finally the work entitled Partition displays brass meshes and travertine surfaces with different opening sizes in a metal structure similar to a room divider. The translucent brass panels and spongelike stone pieces dominated by layers of shrub fabric filter light through intertwined patterns prompting the permeable nature of both artificial and natural constructs.

Damiani's works stand still as rock records which draw attention to the action of large natural forces in small-scaled surfaces constructing a micro-macro representation of an ever-changing realm. The Earth's flows and forces give rise to new interconnected dynamic structures where materials mobilize continuously in a network of infinite unconformities.

La molteplicità di piani e sistemi sovrapposti e interconnessi che compongono la Terra – strato su strato – sembra suggerire che il sottosuolo è costituito da strutture permeabili. I materiali porosi ci circondano, sia in natura che nella tecnologia. Elena Damiani presenta una serie di lavori scultorei che contrappongono velatamente la corrosività del rapporto spazio-tempo alla morbida instabilità della materia, articolando un'immagine della composizione del mondo naturale.

La mostra solleva interrogativi sulla materialità della Terra, evocando l'intreccio di componenti geologiche e processi nascosti che costituisce il nostro ambiente. I lavori alludono a eventi geologici come la sedimentazione e la filtrazione, svelando il carattere permeabile di materiali non consolidati e la meccanica porosa della Terra. Questi elementi sottolineano l'interazione tra strutture fluide, sedimenti mobili e discordanze angolari nella morfologia, che determina la superficie e l'interiorità dinamiche di un corpo privo di limiti ben definiti. Così alcuni lavori scultorei vengono presentati come strati successivi che agiscono da filtri all'interno dello spazio. Essi non sono composti di materiali solidi o compatti, ma di membrane porose, che restano non consolidate e lasciano gli interstizi aperti a flussi luminosi e spazi liminari generativi.

All'ingresso, il lavoro Blind (after Bertoia) – composto da una serie di tubi di rame disposti in fila su una base di marmo – rappresenta il primo strato della mostra. Il punto di partenza è la scultura di Harry Bertoia, Untitled (Monumental Sonambient), dalla Standard Oil Commission, 1975. La struttura metallica presenta cilindri di marmo alternati collocati ad altezze diverse, come un paravento che separa l'entrata della galleria dallo spazio espositivo principale. I piccoli pezzi di marmo e i vuoti verticali producono una luce sempre mobile che balugina sulle superfici in rame.

Le due composizioni geometriche a livello del pavimento evocano processi di filtrazione e di erosione, una riflessione sulla solidità della materia inorganica. Le lastre di travertino e cemento mostrano le superfici piene di piccole cavità caratteristiche dei materiali permeabili. Unsaturated mudcrack è un lavoro rettangolare composto da tre elementi accostati che formano una superficie incrinata. La lastra di cemento collassata rivela una rete interna di ottone. In Casting voids, due elementi di ottone poggiato su una base di travertino aderente al pavimento. La morfologia peculiare di questo marmo presenta una rete di canali interconnessi di dimensioni e forme non omogenee. La superficie del solido poroso è stata parzialmente colata in ottone, creando volumi positivi che mappano gli spazi vuoti tra i sedimenti rocciosi.

La serie Filters comprende collages di lastre in pietra di diverse densità che incoraggiano una lettura più ravvicinata delle superfici. Testimoniano la presenza di croste e di uno scambio di materiali all'interno di un sottosuolo stratificato. L'accostamento di sezioni in pietra solida, piccoli inserti di metallo e spazi cavi ci pone di fronte a parti di interi, configurazioni e contesti.

Infine, il lavoro intitolato Partition è composto da reti di ottone e superfici in travertino di diverse dimensioni in una struttura metallica che ricorda un divisorio. I pannelli traslucidi di ottone e i tasselli di pietra spugnosa dominati da strati di materia fossile filtrano la luce attraverso motivi intrecciati che alludono alla natura permeabile delle costruzioni sia artificiali che naturali.

I lavori di Damiani stanno immobili come stratificazioni geologiche che dirigono l'attenzione verso l'azione di grandi forze naturali su superfici di piccola scala, componendo una rappresentazione micro e macroscopica di un regno sempre cangiante. I flussi e le forze terrestri fanno emergere nuove strutture dinamiche interconnesse in cui i materiali si muovono senza posa in una rete infinita di discordanze.
